

Joshua Reed
Being and Knowing
Spring, 2017

Study Questions 10

Russell's arguments are two fold. One, Jesus wasn't that wise, and most Christians don't follow his teachings anyway. Two, a god isn't necessary to explain the universe either.

Solving the idea of where do we come from by saying everything was created by god simply pushes the problem back to where did this supposed god come from.

I agree with all of Russell's arguments though I find some stronger than others. I also don't think it's best to target a single religion. Since his time there have been other viewpoints held for atheism that I like more. One for example is that there are several gods known to man. Who's to say which is correct? Who's to say any's correct? Isn't it a bit egotistical to suppose to know what comes after death even though there's literally infinite possibilities?